Omar Samji's recent return as a partner in the firm's Houston office drew coverage from leading legal and industry publications, which highlighted his extensive energy and infrastructure experience and the firm's market-leading Energy and Infrastructure Practice Group.

According to Law360's report, Omar advises energy companies, infrastructure sponsors, and investors on "complex mergers & acquisitions, private equity and debt investments, and project development." Furthermore, he specializes in energy technologies, with an emphasis on the commercialization of advanced geothermal, long-term energy storage, and small modular reactor nuclear technologies.

Tomer Pinkusiewicz, Co-Chair of the Energy and Infrastructure Practice Group, said in a statement to Law360, "The power and renewables market is growing in both scale and complexity — driven by AI-related load growth, energy transition demands, and a rapidly evolving regulatory landscape — and Omar brings the sophisticated transactional experience clients need to navigate these opportunities." He added, "Our lawyers know firsthand the caliber of partner and colleague Omar is, and we are thrilled to welcome him back."

In an interview with Texas Lawyer, Hillary Holmes, Co-Partner in Charge of the Houston office, said the firm is adding talent and skill sets that match what clients and the market need. "It's important we have lawyers who can do whatever it is when the phone rings, and Omar added that depth [in] power, contracts and the power infrastructure piece," she said.

Omar told Texas Lawyer that pairing energy work with the firm's corporate practice is "like a puzzle-piece fit."

Additionally, Global Legal Chronicle reported that Omar's arrival further strengthens Gibson Dunn's "preeminent" Energy and Infrastructure Practice Group, adding that his return to the firm is "a homecoming that reflects its continued investment in top-tier energy and infrastructure talent."
