The recent arrival of partner Matthew Owen in Washington, D.C., generated significant media attention from leading legal and industry publications, highlighting the firm's continued investment in its congressional investigations and trial litigation capabilities.

Bloomberg Law noted that Matthew previously served as "Majority Staff Director and Chief Counsel of the U.S. Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations" and has represented clients in antitrust suits, drug pricing litigation, environmental cases, consumer class actions, contested bankruptcy proceedings, contract disputes, and regulatory matters.

Law360 also quoted Matthew saying he was drawn to the firm's overall platform, including its similar client base and high-complexity matters: "Gibson also remains a litigation-forward firm with a lot of investment in its litigators," Owen said. "That struck me as a great fit."

In the same article, Joseph Warin, who chairs the firm's litigation department in Washington, D.C., and co-chairs its global White Collar Defense and Investigations Practice Group, said Matthew's "encyclopedic command of the pharmaceutical regulatory arena" and proven trial capabilities would be an immediate benefit to clients.

"Matt is a razor-sharp litigator who joins our elite team of lawyers operating at the intersection of complex litigation, governmental regulation, and public policy," Warin said.

The National Law Journal added that Matthew arrives with "experience in multiple branches of government." He held senior roles in the U.S. Senate and clerked for Justice Neil Gorsuch and, from 2010 to 2011, Justice Antonin Scalia.
