Over the past year, Law360 [PDF] Energy MVP Tory Lauterbach (Washington, D.C.) worked on several notable deals, including having served as the lead energy regulatory and development counsel for Vantage Data Centers as the data center developer secured more than 2 gigawatts of electricity supply for its $25 billion Frontier campus being built in Texas and its $15 billion Lighthouse campus in Wisconsin. These deals had their own unique challenges. “Wisconsin and Texas have completely different regulatory regimes, and they also have different energy demands,” Tory said. “Being able to create a commercial energy solution that works in two wildly different jurisdictions was an honor, a privilege and a challenge.”

Tory’s advice to young lawyers is to be very thoughtful about what area of law they want to pursue. “There's a lot of different ways to have an exciting career,” she said. “But if you look for the thing that lights up your brain, and then really seek to do that thing with a team that is also excited about the work and that lifts up the work and that lifts you up, it's really a key to success.”
