Following the Rules

Interviewed on the Following the Rules podcast, London partner Matthew Nunan outlines the changes he believes are necessary to future-proof both the UK's finance regulator, the Financial Conduct Authority (FCA), and the country's top prosecution agency, the Serious Fraud Office (SFO), and explains why it's vital for the two organizations to begin working together more effectively. "You would hope that they could have a straightforward conversation, which says, 'What are we here to do? What are you here to do? And also, how can you help?'" Matthew Nunan is the former head of wholesale enforcement at the FCA and spent six years as a case controller at the SFO. In the podcast, he also discusses how the UK's accountability regime for senior City staff could be improved, where the City needs clarity from the government as to its Brexit plans, and much more.
