The Daily Journal [PDF] profiled partner Stuart Rosenberg after he was named one of its Top 100 Lawyers in California. He discussed why a love of science and teaching influenced his decision to pursue IP litigation. “Being an IP litigator gives me the chance to talk directly to the engineers who are building amazing technology and then turn around and explain that technology to judges, juries and mediators in clear and simple terms, so I can help my clients win and resolve their cases,” he said.

Stuart also talked about his approach to his work. “I try to treat every day as an opportunity to learn something new and to help my clients solve their problems, whether that means finding the next key argument that gives us the best chance to win the case, or finding the best path forward to a resolution so that my client can focus on its business without the distraction of litigation,” he said.
