

Webcast: Government Scrutiny of Colleges and Universities

Webcasts | December 15, 2025

Colleges and universities continue to face an unprecedented level of government scrutiny in 2025. Following executive orders from the Trump administration on issues impacting higher education as well as heightened congressional interest in activities on college campuses, various government agencies and entities continue to implement sweeping policy changes, initiate investigations, and issue broad guidance with wide-ranging implications for colleges and universities. Congressional committees in the House and Senate are investigating a range of issues including charges of antisemitism and of antitrust violations relating to admissions and financial aid policies. Private plaintiffs are also joining the fray, presenting additional challenges. Our in-depth discussion revolves around the Trump administration's approach to higher education and what we expect to be the key areas of government investigation and enforcement in higher education, and related private litigation, as we head into the close of the first year of the current administration. Topics include:

- The administration's priorities in higher education, including DEI initiatives, sex and gender identity, First Amendment and free speech issues, combatting antisemitism on campus, immigration, and federal grantmaking
- Expected areas of agency oversight and enforcement activity, including from the Department of Justice, the Department of Health and Human Services, the Department of Education, and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission
- Anticipated rulemaking over the next 18 months impacting higher education
- What to expect in Congressional investigations
- Developments and emerging risks in private litigation
- Areas of potential future focus, including AI
