It should come as no surprise that Monica Loseman chose to return to Colorado after a stint working and studying in Washington D.C. After all, she's a third-generation Colorado native. Her return was practically mandatory.

Loseman, her mother and her maternal grandparents all graduated from Golden High School. She said she was eager to return to Colorado to raise her family and involve herself in the community.

"The plan was always to come back here and develop my practice here in Colorado," said Loseman, who returned to Colorado in 2002.

"I mean what's not to love about Colorado? You can't beat Colorado, especially when you work in law here. The Bar [Colorado Bar Association] here is a pretty unique group because we take our work seriously, but we also treat each other with the respect we all deserve."

Loseman, who concentrates in securities litigation, government investigations and professional malpractice claims defense, also does pro-bono work helping victims of sex trafficking, disabled children, domestic abuse victims, among others.

She also serves as a vice president on the board of Disability Law Colorado, a nonprofit specializing in civil rights and discrimination issues. And she was instrumental in helping start a charter public high school in Douglas County designed to help lower income students achieve collegiate success.

She said what she likes most about being an attorney is when she's involved in "work that really goes to the heart of the rule of law. It's so centrally important to the functioning of our society."
