Robyn Zolman's interest in business deals started when she was a child and she'd accompany her father to work. Watching him pursue business deals was exciting and gave her a glimpse of a future career, which eventually led her to transactional corporate law and finance.

Zolman said she finds joy in the combination of work that's both important and meaningful.

"When the hours are long and stress involved, whether pro bono or billable, I get satisfaction from feeling like I've come alongside them to achieve their objectives."

Zolman's long hours involve extensive pro bono work to help clients navigate difficult situations. Her passion for pro bono work stems from the family model she grew up with — Zolman was encouraged to give back and invest in the community.

in never falling, but in rising every time we fall.*

"Pro bono is a duty and honor as an attorney to use our skill set to help those who otherwise couldn't have legal representation in a situation they don't know how to navigate," she said.

Last year, Zolman was one of nine people recognized in Law 360 as a rising star under 40 for capital markets nationwide.

"To me, whether you're in Denver or New York, I'm doing the same level of sophistication and cutting edge work here in Denver, in the place that I love with my home and my family," she said.

Zolman has been frequently asked to speak at Security and Exchange Commission-related conferences, presenting on SEC recent developments and relevant matters such as corporate governance and initial public offerings.
