Bloomberg Law's New York Brief (subscription required) newsletter features an interview with Yaira Dubin, who joined the firm in April and leads our New York appellate practice, which she says has the potential for extensive growth: "Companies are here. New York has some of the most interesting legal questions across the country."

Yaira rejected the notion that U.S. Supreme Court justices are rigid in their thinking. "You will see, if you listen to arguments, justices asking questions that are genuine—they want to know the answers—and those answers will affect how they think about the case," she said.

In the interview, Yaira also discussed the book currently on her nightstand ("The Shards" by Bret Easton Ellis) and her favorite lunch spot (Sweetgreen).
